Defendants. Nor has Plaintiff given permission to Defendants to use the Defendants' Infringing Marks.

26. Upon information and belief, Defendants were well aware of Morgan Stanley and its use of the MORGAN STANLEY marks at the time Defendants unlawfully created and used the Infringing Websites and the Defendants' Infringing Marks.

27. Defendants' use of the Infringing Websites and the Defendants' Infringing Marks is likely to cause, and upon information and belief has caused, confusion as to the source and origin of Defendants' purported services.

28. Defendants' use of the Infringing Websites and the Defendants' Infringing Marks is likely to deceive, and upon information and belief has deceived, the public by misleading consumers into believing that Defendants' purported services emanate from, are approved, authorized, endorsed or sponsored by, or are in some way associated or connected with Morgan Stanley.

Global Economic Forum*Concerning Conditional Commitments Label Views

Masa) Pradhan | London

The time-commitment tool has served its purpose in these ways. We believe that it is likely to retain an important role even once central banks start hiking rates. Given its success, we believe that central banks could employ similar strategies should they need to signal a pause in their hiking cycle or sell QE assets in a moderated manner.

Perspectives*Global Macro: Reviewing Our Research Process

Henry H. Meyer

The ongoing uncertainty in the markets has prompted many investors to re-examine their investment processes. Morgan Stanley Investment Management's Head of Global Macro and Asset Allocation, Henry H. Meyer, and his team are no exception. In his latest paper, Henry details how he has come to view his team's approach as "data-driven fundamentalist".

Journal of Applied Corporate Finance*Market Efficiency and Risk Management

The efficient markets hypothesis has been identified by some as a major contributor to the financial crisis. This issue of the JACF argues that holding the EMH responsible for the crisis involves a serious misreading of the theory, which does not say that current market prices are always the "right" prices. Nor does EMH imply that past distributions of prices will repeat themselves in the future, as the risk models used by some financial institutions appear to have assumed. Consistent with this "stripped-down" view of the EMH, a number of articles, as well as a roundtable put on by the International Insurance Society, examine the role of risk management after the crisis.

Global Strategy Roundup*Global Equity Strategy: Buy Energy, Sell Materials

We upgraded Energy to overweight and downgraded Materials to neutral. We had been tactically cautious on Energy given concerns that earnings risks were underappreciated. But we think sector-specific and macro factors are now more supportive for Energy than for Materials. Oil price fundamentals are improving and should continue to firm heading into 2010. There is a large differential between spot, the forward curve, and the oil price embedded in earnings expectations.

Concerning Conditional Commitments

Latest Views

Manoj Pradhan | London

The time-commitment tool has served its purpose in three ways. We believe that it is likely to retain an important role even once central banks start hiking rates. Given its success, we believe that central banks could employ similar strategies should they need to signal a pause in their hiking cycle or sell QE assets in a moderated manner.

Global Macro: Reviewing Our Research Process

Henry H. McVey

The ongoing uncertainty in the markets has prompted many investors to re-examine their investment processes. Morgan Stanley Investment Management's Head of Global Macro and Asset Allocation, Henry H. McVey, and his team are no exception. In his latest paper, Henry details how he has come to view his team's approach as "data-driven fundamentalist".

Market Efficiency and Risk Management

The efficient markets hypothesis has been identified by some as a major contributor to the financial crisis. This issue of the JACF argues that holding the EMH responsible for the crisis involves a serious misreading of the theory, which does not say that current market prices are always the "right" prices. Nor does EMH imply that past distributions of prices will repeat themselves in the future, as the risk models used by some financial institutions appear to have assumed. Consistent with this "stripped-down" view of the EMH, a number of articles, as well as a roundtable put on by the International Insurance Society, examine the role of risk management after the crisis.

Global Strategy Roundup

Global Equity Strategy: Buy Energy, Sell Materials

We upgraded Energy to overweight and downgraded Materials to neutral. We had been tactically cautious on Energy given concerns that earnings risks were underappreciated. But we think sector-specific and macro factors are now more supportive for Energy than for Materials. Oil price fundamentals are improving and should continue to firm heading into 2H10. There is a large differential between spot, the forward curve, and the oil price embedded in earnings expectations.

Concerning Conditional Commitments

Latest View

Manoj Pradhan | London

The time-commitment tool has served its purpose in three ways. We believe that it is likely to retain an important role even once central banks start hiking rates. Given its success, we believe that central banks could employ similar strategies should they need to signal a pause in their hiking cycle or sell QE assets in a moderated manner.

Global Macro: Reviewing Our Research Process

Henry H. McVey

The ongoing uncertainty in the markets has prompted many investors to re-examine their investment processes. Morgan Stanley Investment Management's Head of Global Macro and Asset Allocation, Henry H. ##### Market Efficiency and Risk Management

The efficient markets hypothesis has been identified by some as a major contributor to the financial crisis. This issue of the JACF argues that holding the EMH responsible for the crisis involves a serious misreading of the theory, which does not say that current market prices are always the "right" prices. Nor does EMH imply that past distributions of prices will repeat themselves in the future, as the risk models used by some financial institutions appear to have assumed. Consistent with this "shipped-down" view of the EMH, a number of articles, as well as a roundtable put on by the International Insurance Society, examine the role of risk management after the crisis.

Global Equity Strategy: Buy Energy, Sell Materials

We upgraded Energy to overweight and downgraded Materials to neutral. We had been typically cautious on Energy given concerns that earnings risks were underappreciated. But we think sector-specific and macro factors are now more supportive for Energy than for Materials. Oil price fundamentals are improving and should continue to firm heading into 2H10. There is a large differential between spot, the forward curve, and the oil price embedded in earnings expectations.
